Gavin Furukawa
Assistant Professor in the Department of English Studies,
Faculty of Foreign Studies, Sophia University

Gavin received his doctorate from the Department of Second Language Studies at the University of Hawaii at Manoa. He specializes in discourse analysis research on language ideologies in Japan and the United States particularly as it relates to gender, sexuality, social media, mass media, intercultural communications, and linguicism. He currently teaches graduate courses on classroom discourse and World Englishes as well as undergraduate courses in composition and sociolinguistics.

Makiko Deguchi
Professor in the Department of English Studies,
Faculty of Foreign Studies, Sophia University

She received her doctorate in Cultural Psychology from Boston College. She specializes in psychology of discrimination, psychology of privilege, cultural psychology, and public speaking in English. Her research interests include investigating factors that lead people to take collective action (i.e. demonstrations and protests), qualitative research on life histories of people who become allies to minority groups. She currently teaches courses in Cultural Psychology, Psychology of Discrimination, Psychology of Positionality: Understanding Majority Privilege, and a seminar in Qualitative Research Methods in Psychology.

Erich Havranek
Full Time Lecturer,
Center for Global Education and Discovery, Sophia University
Academic Degrees: M.A. (Vienna University), B.A. (Vienna University)

Research Interests and Teaching Experience:
His main research fields are intercultural learning; German as a foreign language; German literature; and censorship in Japan in the interwar period. He has taught
German as a second language in courses for refugees and migrants in Vienna, German as a foreign language at Sophia University, academic paper writing and research as well as intercultural learning at the institute for Japanese Studies at Vienna University. As the OeAD-lecturer at Sophia University he also teaches classes on intercultural competence and Austrian cultural history and is visiting fellow at the European Institute where he is responsible for the Austrian Collection at the library.

Selected Publications:

Tomoki Kunieda
Associate Professor, Department of Journalism, Faculty of Humanities, Sophia University

Tomoki Kunieda specializes in the field of public relations history, teaching public relations, advertisement, mass communications and media industry. He has written multiple academic journal articles and done presentations on topics such as the historical development of public relations in the Tokyo Metropolitan Government, historical international proliferation of PR practice and the PR historiography. He is a member of the board of directors of Japan Society for Corporate Communication Studies. He earned his B.A. in law and M.A. and Ph.D. in journalism from Sophia University.